the Unspoken Truths of Leadership

Our experience, based on thousands of hours of interaction with leaders, has led us to acknowledge that there is a need to clarify misconceptions, and discuss what is not spoken as a truth in leadership. In these leadership dialogues we will analyze various leadership phases and paradoxes; we will enhance potential and discuss the challenges and the opportunities that come along with it, and we will explore the conflict of the inner and the outer world. We will differentiate between the measurable, quantifiable and tangible aspects of leadership and the non-measurable, qualitative and the intangible aspects, so that we can answer to challenges of leadership dynamics using the right strategies.

Our interdisciplinary approach based on the Science of Value, Neuroscience, Psychology and the Art of Influence, will allow us to acquire a multivariate perspective. Participants are expected to synthesize their personal leadership canvas, with an emphasis on the preferred leadership style and the set of leadership qualities towards the path to leadership development.

The main resource of every leader in exercising leadership, is himself. Which are, however, the stages of leadership development so that the self of the leader enriches his role? What is required in each of these stages? How and in which areas can we identify self-deception, and how risky is it when exercising leadership? How can it be measured or improved and to which extent? All these questions will be addressed in this short session of Leading with Significance, and key areas to discuss are the ways to improve company's culture, results and employees' engagement, the ways that leaders grow, and the steps towards significance and how these steps are linked to the meaning they get towards stakeholders, clients and employees.
